Tyson's Time

The true story of a rescue pit bull everyone feared — who became a kitten's best friend. A children's book, a growing audience, and a family media brand built around a real dog.

PART 1

The Story

Tyson is a real rescue pit bull. He was returned by his first family and spent two years in a kennel before coming home. A few months ago a tiny rescue kitten named Miss moved in — and everyone said that was a mistake. Instead, the 70-pound dog everyone feared became the kitten's gentlest friend.

That's not a marketing angle. It's documented daily on video, and it's the engine of everything in this packet.

Why this works commercially

- Pet content is the strongest category on social media — and "unlikely animal friendships" (a feared dog + a fearless kitten) is its most shareable sub-genre.
- The pit bull redemption story is a cultural movement — audiences actively seek content that flips the breed stereotype.
- The character already exists. Most children's brands have to invent their hero. Tyson is real, filmed daily, and already has a story arc people cry over.

The one-sentence pitch: Bluey started as a cartoon and became a billion-dollar brand. Tyson starts as a real dog — the book, the videos, and the products all grow from an animal people can actually meet, follow, and love.

PART 3

The Numbers — Stated Honestly

Family money deserves the truth, so here it is without polish:

METRIC	TODAY
Short-form views, last ~30 days (all platforms)	~15,000+
Typical views per post	400 – 2,200
Best post engagement rate	7.3% (excellent)
YouTube subscribers (500 unlocks ad revenue)	52
New subscribers per strong post	+10 to +12
Kit sales to date	0 external (checkout verified with a real $19 test)
Revenue to date	Pre-revenue

What this says: the content works — engagement rates are well above platform averages and every good post adds subscribers. The audience is simply still small. This is a traffic problem, not a product problem, and traffic is bought with consistency and time — which is exactly what the funding buys.

Every figure above was pulled directly from the platform and payment accounts on July 31, 2026 — not estimated.

The 6-Month Plan

Months 1–2 — Grow

- Daily story-first shorts (already automated); kit sold via bio and pinned comments
- Cross the 500-subscriber YouTube threshold → native ad revenue switches on
- Lock character art designs for the book (Tyson, Miss, Walker)

Months 2–4 — Illustrate & Launch the Book

- Commission the book's illustrations (the single biggest use of funds)
- Publish on Amazon KDP: print-on-demand, zero inventory, ~$5–8 profit per copy
- Launch to the audience as "the story you've been watching, now a real book"

Months 4–6 — Multiply

- Animated shorts made from book pages (AI pipeline already selected)
- Read-along videos for YouTube; second product ladder begins (coloring book, stickers)

Use of funds

ITEM	AMOUNT
Book illustration (professional, 39 spreads)	$1,500 – $2,500
First print run of samples + launch copies	$300
Content tools & software (6 months)	$400
Reserve / contingency	$300
Total ask	$2,500 – $3,500

PART 5

The Ask

I'm raising a founder loan of $2,500–$3,500 from people who know me, to carry this from "everything is built" to "the book is on Amazon and the channel is monetized."

Proposed terms (open to discussion)

STRUCTURE

TERMS

Simple loan	Repaid in 12 monthly payments beginning month 4, plus 10% total
Revenue share (alternative)	20% of all Tyson's Time revenue until 1.5× the loan is repaid
Security	Written note, signed. Book royalties assigned as collateral until repaid.

What you're really funding

Not an experiment — the finishing move. The manuscript is written. The storefront works. The channels post daily on automation. The one missing piece between here and a sellable book is illustration, and that is precisely what this money buys.

What's in your hands right now: this packet, plus the full 43-page print sample of "Tyson and the Kitten." Read it tonight. If the story doesn't convince you, the numbers don't have to.
